house pleased with yourself, with your neighbor and with the world in general. The scene of Miss Russell's latest triumph was the Lyceum, and the vehicle "A Royal Family." The gentleman who wrote this play is nebulously known as "R. Marshall," and he gained a certain amount of Western admiration by giving to the Empire Theatre last season a comedy called "His Excellency the Governor." In that play he introduced songbirds, and was voted a success. Last night he put Miss Russell and the man who loved her—a Crown Prince, of course—up an apple tree. It was no easy task for Miss Russell to climb into that tree, and when her father, the King, and her mother, the Queen Dowager, and His Eminence the Cardinal ate luncheon beneath its welcome shade and looked up among the blossoms and failed to see the slender limbs of Miss Russell and the much more substantial ones of Charles Richman, who personated the Crown Prince, the situation became ridiculous—remarkably so.

Russell would certainly be compiled to marry Richman under any form of government. I am giad she did so.

Therefore, when the as a star, allows his wife, Miss Lipman, to shout from the stage of the Garrick this sentiment: "The worst of women is too good for the best of inch." he should be censured. The line should have been stricken from the book the moment it was written. It is from the room is as clever as a pointing book the moment it was written. It is neither nice nor safe. It is a line far more dangerous than spiral staircases, and is not even clever. It is purely vulgar. It is essentially improper. Epigrammatic is this sentence, we will admit, but no one wishes his wife or his daughter or even his enemy to feed on epigrams of this character. The Congress of the United States has made it unlawful to bring into this country paintings and literature harmful to the morals. Why then should so unhealthy a sentiment be allowed to thrive at a theatre but a few doors from Broadway? In other respects "All on Account of Eliza" is well worth seeing. Suit has been brought in Chicago by John A. Frarer against Charles Prohman and J. M. An amount aggregating over $1,00,000, the gross receipts in the last three seates son, is involved.

The suit is one of the most novel on record. Mr. Barrie is accused of plagtarizing and pirating his own book.

It is claimed that before Mr. Barrie became a famous author he wrote "The Little Minister," and while it was still in manuscript sold the American rights of publication, which under the copyright laws include the exclusive right to dramatize, to the United States Book Company.
